Research interests

Current research is in the area of global environmental politics; governance and political structures at the local level through to the level of international organisations that include the United Nations and the World Bank; the participation of indigenous peoples in global governance; and the role of the indigenous peoples of Ecuador in environmental protection based on fieldwork conducted in 2016. Ongoing primary research in New York with participants from Ecuadorian indigenous communities, environmental lawyers and Corporate Social Responsibility institutions.

Additional work in progress is a chapter for the Latin American Bureau (publishers) forthcoming title Voices of Latin America (2018), to be published jointly with Practical Action Books.

MA in International Relations that included specialisation in Global Environment Politics; War and Peace studies, and the European Union.

Areas of interest are Development Studies, modules of which I have taught since 2006 in the fields of colonialism, dependency theory, global environmental governance, humanitarian intervention and security. Taught modules on Gender and Society, Environment and Development, Global Rural Geographies and Qualitative Methods.
